HISTORIC 1951 MOVE NPS TO MONTEREY FROM ANNAPOLIS

Few outside of the government saw Secretary of the Navy Dan Kimball's December 1951 message that went to all Navy ships and bases.

It was a brief message announcing a change of address for the U.S. Naval Postgraduate School from Annapolis, Maryland to Monterey, California. Kimball's message stated that the new address, or redesignation in Navy parlance, would become effective on Dec. 22, 1951.

It was the final administrative step that brought an official end to a lengthy political stalemate and several years of verbal sparring by Maryland legislators.

The action freed the Navy's graduate university from its cramped quarters at the Naval Academy, and allowed its transcontinental transfer — lock, stock and wind tunnel — to Monterey.

The move, virtually unparalleled in the history of American universities and colleges, affected about 500 people — 370 students, 65 civilian faculty members, 25 Navy staff officers and 25 civil service employees. Several tons of scientific instruments, from microscopes to radars and early computing machines, were transported by railroad and Navy ships to the grounds of the old Del Monte Hotel. Congress had passed Public Law No. 302 in July 1947, appropriating $2.13 million for the Navy purchase of the former world-class resort and more than 600 acres of land to provide a campus for the Naval Postgraduate School.

But, in an attempt to retain the school in Annapolis, Maryland's delegation successfully lobbied against legislation that would provide funds to build the necessary academic buildings for the institution. The political logjam did not begin to clear until Rear Adm. Ernest E. Herrmann took the helm of the Navy university in June 1950.

Encountering a hostile Annapolis business community determined to keep the school in its Naval Academy-based quarters, Herrmann engaged in marathon meetings with local government and business leaders. Before leaving for Monterey, Herrmann would comment: "It is to the great and lasting credit of Annapolis that (the community) has looked upon our departure with kindness and wished us well."

In the 40 years since the Naval Postgraduate School's move, the Navy has continued to invest in advanced education. Today's student population exceeds 1,800, more than four times its 1951 figure, and the graduate university now draws military officers from all U.S.

uniformed services, civilians employees from the Department of Defense and other government agencies, and officers from nearly 30 allied nations.

The high-caliber institution has attracted other Navy and DOD activities to Monterey, bringing significant increases in professional and technical job opportunities to the Monterey Peninsula and an annual payroll that tops $105 million. With nearly $5 million in local purchases and the revenue generated by the more than 17,000 visitors attending scientific and technical conferences annually at the Naval Postgraduate School, the institution represents one of the top Peninsula businesses.

the human resources that NPS brings to the community. Students, faculty, staff members and their spouses dedicate thousands of hours each year to volunteer and charitable programs on the Peninsula, from the Alliance on Aging to the United Way. Their efforts enrich the athletic, educational and social services activities in the community.

Secretary of the Navy H. Lawrence Garrett III has described the school as "the front line of the future" for the U.S. military. "Perhaps nowhere in the world can you find a school ... with such a clear focus on its reason for being."

Advanced degrees earned at the Naval Postgraduate School, from the masters to the doctorates, are fully accredited.

According to Dr. Allen Bromley, President Bush's science advisor, NPS degrees are "the equal of any being awarded anywhere in the world."

And, according to Secretary of Defense Richard Cheney, "The school is absolutely vital."
